Exploring an Ancient Maya City

Norman Hammond, Professor Emeritus of Archaeology at Boston University and archeology correspondent for The Times of London presents a free public lecture at the University on September 24.

The cities of the Ancient Maya vanished under the Central American jungle more than a thousand years ago: over the past 170 years many of them have been rediscovered and explored.

La Milpa, in northwestern Belize, is one of those cities most recently investigated: its rapid rise, sudden fall, and complex urban structure have shed new light on the precariousness of Maya existence.

The Internet: Today and the future

The Internet is arguably one of the most transformative forces in society today, and its impact on our lives continues to evolve. This year's Vice-Chancellor's Lecture Series, 'The Internet - Today and the future', examines aspects of this rapid evolution and the research it has spawned: How might we be able to transmit videos in better quality? How can we keep safe on the mobile Internet? How is the Internet transforming tourism? And how can we build backbone networks that meet our future needs?
