

Postgraduate Students: The Embargoing of Theses

The following guidelines apply to all versions of the thesis, whether electronic or hard copy.

The University of Auckland holds to the principle that research undertaken by students and presented as a thesis in partial or complete requirement for the award of a postgraduate degree should be in the public domain. However, the University also recognises that exceptions will arise. A thesis deposited in The University of Auckland Library will normally be available for public consultation unless there are compelling reasons for restricting access to it. The terms under which postgraduate students may request an embargo be placed on public access to their thesis are:

1. Access to a thesis may be restricted, normally for a maximum of two years, if it contains confidential and sensitive material that would:
 - (i) breach prior contractual arrangements with outside organisations; or
 - (ii) prevent or jeopardise an application for a patent, licence, or registration; or
 - (iii) provide good reason for refusing to disclose the contents of the thesis, consistent with the provisions of the Privacy Act (1993) or the Official Information Act (1982).
2. Access to a thesis may be restricted, normally for a maximum of one year, if there are plans to publish all or part of the thesis, and it is believed that public access will jeopardise the author's intellectual property rights. Note: in most cases it is not necessary to embargo a thesis because of publication plans and an embargo may be detrimental to the dissemination of the research.

An application for an embargo is to be made by the author of the thesis and/or the supervisor, through the Head of Department to the Dean of Graduate Studies. The Thesis Embargo Form can be found at:

<http://www.auckland.ac.nz/uoac/cs-pg-doctoral-forms>

Note to students regarding print-on-demand publishing

Once your thesis is available online through the University Library you may be approached by a publisher who offers to publish it as a book. Some publishers operate on what is known as a 'print-on-demand' basis. This means they do not print any copies until someone orders a copy (apart from the sample copies they send the author) and they do not contribute any formatting or copy-editing normally associated with 'publishing'. The manuscript is not refereed as per standard scholarly practice.

Print-on-demand publishers tend not to invest in any marketing apart from uploading a record for the 'book' to online booksellers (e.g. Amazon and Barnes & Noble) (which is free). They rely on the author promoting the book to friends and family and the university library. Although they offer royalties, the small print indicates that this is only when monthly sales exceed a specified level (which rarely happens).

If you decide to go ahead with a print-on-demand publisher, it is VERY important that you specify to the publisher that The University of Auckland Library has a right to keep the WHOLE digital version of your thesis on the library website. Otherwise, the University Library may be asked to remove the thesis, which would not be in the best interests of you as the author.