Her research has been recognised with a range of scholarships and awards, including a Fulbright Senior Fellowship, Fellow of the New Zealand Geographical Society, Fellow of the Royal Society of New Zealand, and Fellow of the Academy of Social Sciences (UK).

Turning the University Inside Out ?

School of Environment Inaugural Cumberland Lecture

Discussions of the so-called 'neoliberal university' tend to focus on how the commercialisation of academic knowledge is affecting research, university missions and the boundaries of public universities. In such discussions attention is drawn to processes of marketisation, the ever increasing encroachment of 'audit culture', and the rise of competitive academic subjectivities. This paper argues the picture is more complicated than is often assumed, and demonstrates the need for a more expansive focus on the multiple modes of contact between academic, policy and practitioner worlds. It identifies the new knowledge forms that are emerging, and explores the implications of new kinds of value generating labour. It concludes by asking what these changes mean for academic spaces and subjectivities.

Kenneth Brailey Cumberland was renowned for his ground-breaking 1981 documentary series Landmarks, presenting his view of the story of New Zealand. The achievements of this English-born geography professor were many: establishing and heading Auckland University's Geography Department, writing on soil erosion, producing 13 editions of an Australasian school atlas, and helping plan Auckland's development.
